lowing black and white tie.

When he says that, and drops his over an imaginary audience, you wouldn't be surprised to hear him say he was going to piay Othello. He is so grave and big and so in earnest. But the monologue is not Othello, or in the monologue, is not in the monologue, is expression all good nature. It read something for you now, though my eyes aren't what they were when I was in topizate ho finy glory. He took the book—a little red book that his hand quite covered up, and he read what he was tasked to read.

Brisk, break, break.

On thy cold, gray stones, O sea.
And I would that I could utter.

The thoughts that arise in me.

The poem was so little and the man

An' nothin' to do but laugh, my audience won't have. I'll give 'em all the good stories I've got—and I'll tell 'em my Coney Island play. Here it is: 'What. I'll say, 'does this here government want of the Philippines? or Cuba? Ain't it got Coney? Ain't got Coney? Island, too? Well, let's get New York buying the whole thing, standin' the goff to the last inch of the island and leavin't ha Philippines be.

"What stories I've all 'em my day it at alie is me.

The thoughts that arise is me.

Was so big it was a question whether the noticed it at all, though he read it quite through.

He hand back the book with grave simplicity, and his simplicity, and his simplicity and his with what he had just read.

the last inch of the island and leaving the Philippines be.

"What stories will I tell 'em?" repeated Mr. Sullivan reflectively; 'not many about me. Maybe one about Nobby Clark, when he got asked over in Singland about American shooters. Can they hit, Nobby? says somebody. 'Can they hit, 'says Nobby; 'my head's so full o' bullets from 'em it rattles when I move!' Not many stories about me, though," repeated Mr. Sullivan, 'unless the one when I was out in the Samoans, It's hot out there, you know, A Samoan come up to me an' I says, 'Well, whose President of the United States?' 'John L. Sullivan,' says he.

"Momes Will see Mar.

Women Will See Him.

"Tou see," said Mr. Sullivan, "the way I'm known like that through the country makes the moneiogue a good idea—grandest ever happened, I think. Women and thad no chance to see me. They couldn't come to the ring. Now they can come. There and the ouse burnin' it up putting on a play. I'd obeht to just be myself. An' they'il all gat their's money worth. I ain't tryin to throw the con.

This is certin: Mr. Sullivan will be heard to the edge of the lobby. He has a voice quite his own size.

"I ain't trained it as I know of," he said, "but do you remember in the hacksmith play how I used to say, "Band back!" That's the tone that gets heard to a finish. That's the tone that gets meard to a finish. That's the tone that gets meard to a finish. That's the tone that gets more consed and I was tryin' to break my contract. I says. Elither you thnorn sports can break this contract of I'll smash the stage, "The contract of I'll smash the stage," The contract of I'll smash the stage, "The contr

Mr. Sullivan drew his slik handkerdile through his hands—you simply cambot get over the power of his hands, as he talks; siot his own size or the shape of his great shoulders and neck of the look of his coat-sleeve above the elbow impresses you the way his hands do. And while he toyed with the hand-kerchief he considered a possibility.

"If I get an encore." he said, thoughtfully, "I may recite some poetry."

Now the notion of John L. Sullivan reading poetry to a vaudeville audience was a new notion, but a perfectly possible.
